In the room of this grief-shadowed Present there shall be A Present in whose reign no grief shall gnaw The heart, and never shall a tender tie Be broken—in whose reign the eternal Change Travagant as any ever pictured by the most reckless vellow-covered romaneist. Comreckless vellow-covered romancist. Common-place as the name is, it describes a man who has a score of times balanced himself upon the scales of fate when the slightest adverse tremer meant death to him. When the writer last saw him he was a nabob on California street, San Francisco. He had a clear title to a 100,000 good gold dollars, and he ate expensive dinners at the "Poodle Yesterday he scrubbed a bar-room and kitchen, and carried off the refuse of a tenement-house, taking a stale loaf of rye bread for a reward, upon which he feasted ravenously. Gardiner's life has been a nigthmare. With fortune's chances be has been shot into affluence with the speed and giddiness of a rocket, and with the same chances he has fallen as precipitately as the stick of the discharged fire-ball. At sixteen he was matriculated at Oxford, and in his freshman year in a boyish fight he threw his adversary so as to dislocate his neck. The unfortunate youth was of noble family, and Gardiner was transported for life. Within the first year of his confinement at New Zealand he escaped to the bush, where he joined by a number of miserable companions, and for years the band were a terror to the settlements. A price was put upon his head, and his companions were offered a free pardon to deliver him up to the authorities. He escaped to Melbourne, where he was apprehended, and, again escaping, he a second time took to the bush. In Australia the shepherds were friendly to him, and one of them one day brought him the first intelligence he had received from home in over fifteen years. It was a notification of his pardon, and in August, 1873, he left the colonies a free man, and celebrated his Christmas in

For awhile his luck seemed to change in this country. Though in the colonies he had at various times been possessed of a fortune, he held it in constant fear of apprehension, and being careless of what became of it, his vicissitudes were often painfully had been his practice for many years to acsudden. He brought money with him to cumulate and secrete his savings. Such a the coast, and in the stock excitement of habit is common enough in out-of-the-way 1874 he made large profits. While he was in that portion of the State of Nevada near Virginia he was men of the freight trains; but after that of the task he had undertaken. At a man, with a liberality worthy of the occa-watering-place, a station beyond where he sion, took the 18,000 francs, and, by way of freight, and acting upon the advice of the railroad man he boarded the cow-catcher £12 English money, or, in French coinage, of the engine, and crawled upon the plat-form, resting his back against the hot crown-

sheet of the boiler. A RIDE ON. A LOCOMOTIVE.

In this way he rode over a whole division (about 125 miles), and what his sensations were, sitting on the face of the rushing locomotive as it plunged through the darkness at fifteen or twenty miles an hour, can be more easily imagined than described. At the end of the division he was discovered and forced to loaf around until the next train passed. When this train arrived at the station several empty box-cars were invitingly open, and Gardiner felt that his luck had not yet deserted him. He climbed into one stealthily, and when the train moved off, and he was not disturbed, he fairly hugged himself for joy and disposed himself comfortably for a sleep. His happiness was not of long duration. In the midst of a happy dream two sturdy brakemen awoke him and asked him what he had. He replied "Nothing," and they proposed that he should trade coats with one of them and ride to the end of the division. His coat was comparatively new and had been costly. The brakeman's coat was in rags. But he traded, and at the next station the whole force of the train was mustered, and he was put off the train and left thirty miles from a settlement, in the middle of an alkali desert with a white section-boss and six Chinamen for companions. This was a fair sample of his experience from that time forth, and when Gardiner arrived in Omaha his garments were as picturesque as Joseph's coat, and, as he said with grim humor, they have stuck to him yet. He travelled from Chicago to Pittsburgh just as he travelled from Nevada to Chicago, and when the writer saw him his spirits were as high as when he was a power on California street. Plans for the future. He had none. His sole aim was to reach New York. A New Poem by Bryant. We give below the concluding lines of William Cullen Bryant's new poem "The Flood of Years," the whole of which will be found in Scribner's "Midsummer Holiday Number." This poem will have for many an interest akin to that of Mr. Longfellow's Morituri Salutamus:

THE LIFE OF A BOHEMAN.

The Pittsburgh Dispatch of July 18 has the following:

"They tumbled fifteen of us out of a box-car about two miles from here and we tramped it in," said a lithe-looking, compactly-built, red-bearded man who was lounging about the elevator near the Union depôt yesterday morning. The tails of his coat stopped at his waist, he had no vest, and a red fiamed shirt gleamed through a rent in his outer vestment that once was white but that had been converted by hard times into a dingy brown. His pants were as much too long for him as his coat was too short, and there was a brazen, shiny look about his wardrobe that spoke loudly of an intimate acquaintance with the oil and tar of empty box-cars. But the voice came out in familiar accents through all

TREASURE TROVE-A LARGE SUM OF MO-NEY FOUND BY A FRENCH PRIEST,-The London Telegraph of July 6th says: "Leysand, a little village in the Department of the Ain, has for some time past been agitated by a small romance of its own. Its parish priest or curé, died suddenly, and a young man was appointed in his place. The new incumbent, soon after entering upon his curé, began to rummage about the parsonage. Among a heap of empty bottles he alighted on a couple of small oak chests, or, to speak more exactly, boxes heavily clamped. Forcing them open, he found them stuffed with gold pieces amounting to a total of 18,000 francs, or, as nearly as may be, £270. Nothing would have been easier for him, of course, than to have held his peace about the matter. Instead of this, however, being a young man, and consequently well ballasted with conscience- a commodity which is apt to wear away as life advances-he betook himself to the village Maire. The deceased cure was notoriously a person of economical, not to say miserly, habits, and there was good ground for the belief that it penury, and thrift approaches the borderland of miserdom. "Upon the whole facts of the case there could be little doubt, if any, that the money found in the cellar was the outgoing curé's, well treated by the conductors and brake- and it was accordingly handed over by the Maire to the personal representative of the time he began to appreciate the difficulties | deceased ecclesiastical miser. "Under the Empire a Senate of about one hundred and fifty members cost the country nearly five millions of francs per annum, independently of the administrative expenses of the Chamber, which exceeded a million. The senators appointed under the Constitution of 1852 each received an annual stipend of 30,000 francs, which might be increased from other sources. The Republic has 300 senators, each of which is paid 9,000 francs per annum. The President of the House receives 72,000 francs, with some advantages in residence and service, which permit him to observe an amount of state sufficient under a Democratic form of government, or one which is deemed such. "The stipends of the Questors is also 9,000 francs, but they have suites of rooms and some other advantages attached to the office. As the installation of the upper chamber did not take place until the 8th of March, the amount payable to the senators this year will not exceed 2,191,470 francs; the President will receive 57,000 francs, and the Questors 21,600 francs.
